Images of the Other: Colonial racism and its presence in today's development cooperation

In this one-day workshop for students of the University of Cologne we're going to trace back today's images of the Global South and so called "developing countries" to their emersion in the colonial era. We are going to find out about the structures of colonial racism and discuss its impact on today's development cooperation and the aid industry. In order to do so, we must not only question the connotation of the term "development", but also re-think our own perceptions and stereotypes.

Today, we're inviting you not to hear speeches and lectures but rather to discuss and learn from each other, using participative and interactive methods of political education. This workshop can be attended by anyone – no previous knowledge required. The workshop`s language is English.

Team:

Johannes Schweitzer – Trainer in political and global citizenship education, B.A. in Latin American Studies; Social Sciences & Spanish for teaching degree
